Some historical books are non-fiction, reporting only the facts of a historical situation. Other historical books are novels that mix real events with imaginary occurrences. Is your book non-fiction or is it a historical novel? How can you tell? Do you think that the book would work just as well the other way (that is, either with more imaginary scenes put in, if it is a non-fiction book, or with only factual information, if it is a historical novel)? Why or why not?

People often say that history repeats itself. Do you think that is true? Is it possible that some or all of the events in the book that you read could just as easily happen today? Which events, if any, might happen again? Why do you think so?
